How Does Your Garden Grow?

From garden to table, growing fresh food and cooking healthy meals form the central theme for two new programs at The Open Door this summer and help put good food onto the tables of those who need it the most.

“The Open Door’s core mission is to connect people to good food,” said Julie LaFontaine, The Open Door’s executive director. “Getting back to the basics can lead to better nutrition.”

The Open Door’s Good Food Garden Project has transformed the barren asphalt landscape at the side of the food pantry into a vibrant food-jungle. Using the Square Foot Gardening method, seven families with fifteen children learned how to plan, choose, plant and grow a garden in the raised beds provided by The Open Door. With expertise provided by The Food Project—North Shore and Gloucester’s Backyard Growers, families managed both spring and summer plantings to yield crops they will harvest through mid-October.

“I always wished for a garden but never had a place,” said Andrea Hurlbut, a single mom who packed her 6’ x 4’ garden with tomatoes, brussels sprouts, kale, broccoli, carrots, bush beans, and more.

Now Andrea delights in watching her five-year-old daughter Isidora get involved in planting. “She loves carrots, so I put her in charge of them. It was good for her to be responsible.” But the best part by far, she said, was watching Isidora pick snap peas straight off the vine, and pop them into her mouth. “She was so surprised that something so green could taste that great.”

Parent, Good Food Garden

The Open Door partnered with Cooking Matters, a program of Share Our Strength, to offer family cooking classes. For six weeks, the families enrolled in the Good Food Garden Project learned how to cook, plan and prepare nutritious food with simple ingredients found in the food pantry or at the grocery store along with produce grown from their raised beds. Cooking Matters brought the culinary know-how and a professional chef, while The Open Door’s nutritionist Jen Perry taught the nutrition classes.

“Our family cooking classes are all about getting children invested and actively involved in choosing healthy foods,” said Jen Perry, “rather than just eating what magically appears before them on the table.”

During class, the children prepped food while their parents participated in nutrition education. From making shopping lists to helping put groceries away, parents learned how to engage their children in every aspect of food preparation in the home. Towards the end of class, parents and children came together to cook and then taste the food they prepared. Families were encouraged to discuss and share what they had learned. Each week, families were given a bag of groceries so they could make the meals again in their own kitchens.

“The kids loved taking turns cutting, measuring and deciding together as a group on a meal,” said Rob, a single parent with four children in the home who thought the cooking classes were just fantastic. “They made it fun.”

This was the first of four 6-week sessions of Cooking Matters classes to be offered at The Open Door.

Spanish translation for Cooking Matters classes was provided by Iriana Rodriguez and Jared LaFontaine both are students at Manchester/Essex Regional High School.
